SENATOR BRUNING: Well, I think it's a...I use that as well, but I think it's a relatively complex area of law, and you can learn more, you can understand it better by study and research as opposed to just general knowledge.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Were you an attorney at the time you were doing that research?

SENATOR BRUNING: No, I was a first-year law student.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: But you'd had some acquaintanship with the law...

SENATOR BRUNING: Yes.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...at that time? Okay, so the thing I want to establish is that you were not just a person, a layperson on the street. If you, with your at least nodding acquaintanship with the law,...

PRESIDENT ROBAK: One minute.

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...had to do research to understand these things, why do you think somebody who may not even be able to read a law book and understand what it says is going to know these things that you had to research and which some of our colleagues will not even be aware of yet, despite our discussion? Why is it that you think especially these young people are going to know the law?

SENATOR BRUNING: I don't think that there will be a particular knowledge of aggravating circumstances, what they are, which particular circumstances apply. I do think that there may be a general feeling on the street that the state is cracking down, that's the extent of it. They'll say they'll know someone, they'll have heard of someone. Kevin got the death penalty, Kevin shot a cop, Kevin got the death penalty. And that's how people on the street may get the feeling that it's a deterrent. I don't think they'll understand the particular points of the law. I don't think most people understand that, but that...
